There was a good mix of practical skills and industry insight. I loved learning about typography and sketching because we actually got to make things and not just watch. The career week helped me figure out that I want to go into branding and visual identity.

Georgia

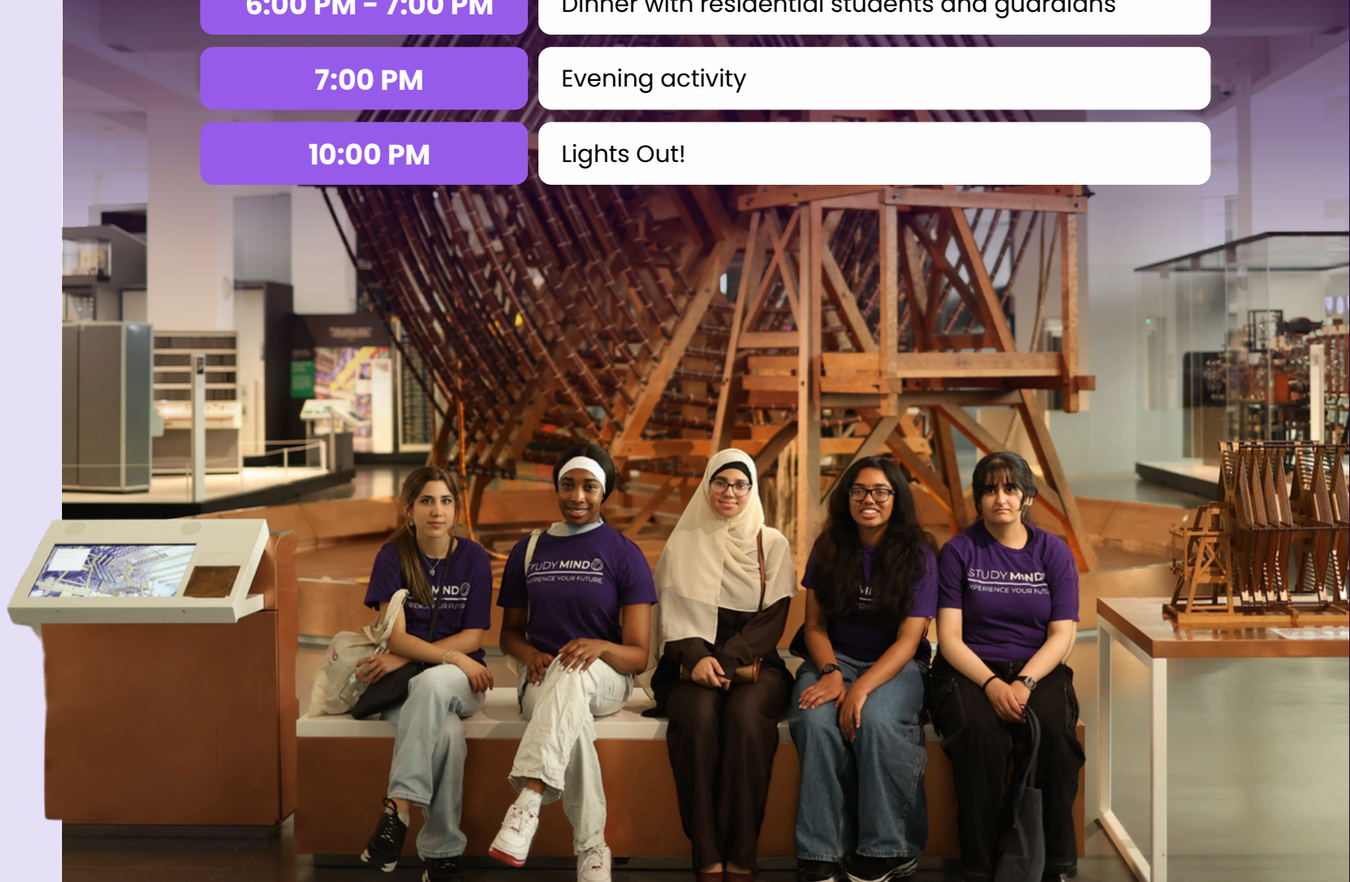

Ruskin: BFA Bachelor of Fine Arts | University of Oxford

Georgia is a London-based artist whose sculptural practice explores the body, technology, and the ethics of artificial intelligence. A graduate of the Ruskin School of Art, University of Oxford, Georgia combines rigorous academic inquiry with a materially driven approach to making, often incorporating silicone, resin, and animatronics into her work.

Her practice is increasingly shaped by questions around the role of AI in creative authorship. In recent projects, including an animatronic silicone tongue that breathes rhythmically, she has explored the boundary between synthetic and organic gesture. This work, rooted in her own experiments with coding, has led her toward a broader interest in how artists might use AI not only as a subject but as a tool within their practice. At the same time, she is critically engaged with the ethical complexities of generative tools, particularly questions of copyright, consent, and appropriation in image-making. Georgia has exhibited widely across London in solo, joint, and group shows.

This week gave me a much clearer idea of what studying and working in graphic design is actually like. What I liked the most was that sessions were a mix of hands on sessions and studio visits. This work experience has prompted me to start building my portfolio and look at creative courses for uni.
